Deal or No Deal is an extraordinarily popular game show in many different countries, including Australia – which was the first nation to get a version of the game other than the original Dutch edition. The game is still on television today, and remains popular due in large part to its very simple premise. Players have the chance to win prizes ranging from a penny to $200,000, and slowly eliminate possible prizes as they move along in the game. The drama comes from “the banker,” who offers a buyout to the player at certain points in the game (usually a little less than the average amount of the remaining possible prizes). The player must then make a choice: take the deal, or risk winning less in the game itself. Coin size: In the breakaway video slot game the coin size is within 0.01 to 0.10. As early as 1960, Aristocrat (as the company was then called) was starting to sell poker machines to casinos outside of Australia's borders. Aristocrat's first sales outside Australia were to various Asian and European markets – the company (probably wisely) kept out of the American gambling market due to fears of the heavy competition taking place among the scores of American gambling supply companies. Remember that in 1960, Aristocrat was not quite a ten year old gaming company, unsure of its ability to compete with groups in the USA that had been in the business already for decades.
